

Global Food Systems – Sovereignty or Trade Rules – or Both

Friday, 09. to Sunday, 11. May 2025

The seminar is dedicated to the second goal of the SDGs, food security, and aims to double agricultural productivity and eliminate trade barriers. In the seminar, we ask ourselves why there is not enough food—or at least not enough healthy food—in some parts of the world, while in other parts, food is produced in abundance. Although enough food is produced worldwide to feed everyone, food shortages and famines continue to occur. The causes are complex and diverse. They are linked to human-induced climate change, but also to corruption, armed conflicts, and unstable markets.

How can we still create the conditions for food sovereignty?

According to the World Agriculture Report, food sovereignty is defined as the right of people and sovereign states to determine their own agricultural and food policies in a democratic way. The cultivation of quinoa in Ecuador serves as an example of local food sovereignty. Since 2011, there has been a rapid increase in the demand for quinoa, leading to its cultivation in 50 countries today. The example of Ecuador reveals the negative consequences that an explosive rise in demand for a product can have on the regions where it is grown, as quinoa is increasingly being cultivated in monocultures. An alternative solution is the international alliance of small farmers, "La Vía Campesina." This initiative coined the term "food sovereignty" and introduced it at the 1996 World Food Summit in Rome as an anti-colonial critique of the external control of states through the international trade regulations of the WTO and the neoliberal loan conditions of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. La Vía Campesina offers small farmers a degree of self-determination and independence from large corporations such as Monsanto. The project promotes fair trade and the traditional cultivation of crops.

Together, we reflect: What responsibility do we, as consumers, bear in achieving a sustainable way of life? To what extent should/can small-scale producers from the Global South feed Western countries? At the same time, we must ask why consumers throw away millions of tons of food every year. In addition to the issue of food waste in the Global North, we want to learn how post-harvest losses in the Global South can be reduced by improving supply chains. What are resilient agricultural methods that increase productivity and yield while also contributing to the preservation of ecosystems?
